She said shady areas could be introduced on beaches and eggs could also be relocated to cooler places to be hatched.

"The research flags the issues to management authorities who prioritise their response based on that."

She said she was hopeful turtles would be able to adapt, although they were not as resilient as they had once been.

"In terms of having more direct impacts on turtles it means reducing the threats turtles face so they have more resilience," she said.

Turtles are currently nesting on beaches in the Burdekin, where temperatures are being monitored.

Ms Fuentes said the temperature there had remained stable for the past four years.

"It's not an issue right now but it's flagged as an issue for the future."
